Getting to the root of the matter

As you know, the most important physical element that comes into play when a person is about to have sex is blood flow - the more blood that flows to their sexual organs, the more powerful and satisfying the experience will be. And we know how to make it happen.

Relatively low-energy, but focused, shock waves target the vascular structures, causing mechanical stress (shear stress) and cellular microtrauma. This in turn stimulates the release of angiogenic factors that trigger neovascularization of the treated area and angiogenesis, improving the blood supply.

Getting the right diagnosis

Before beginning treatment, assess whether the patient's complaint is caused by vascular function, and if so, how severe it is. You can apply industry standards to assess sexual function using a brief survey that evaluates four main domains of - erectile function, orgasmic function, sexual desire, and intercourse satisfaction.

Treatment protocol

Treatment is carried out in six, 15-minute sessions, over the course of three weeks. It is focused on certain key areas, as shown in the table below.

- ♂ Men
Treatment is applied to five specific areas:
- three points perpendicular to the penile shaft
 - two at the base of the penis

- ♀ Women
Treatment is applied to three specific areas:
- left labia majora
 - right labia majora
 - above-center
